R-1.4

Both functions produce the same output. Because its argument is called by reference, the function g() modifies the contents of its actual argument (by incrementing it). In contrast, the argument to function f() is passed by value, and hence its value does not change.